

The House of Representatives

Legislative competence: optional bicameral procedure

The optional bicameral procedure (article 78 of the Constitution)

In the framework of this procedure (also called the optional two-chamber legislative procedure) the House decides and the Senate intervenes as a “chamber of consideration and reflection”. The Senate may “evoke” the Bills submitted to the House of Representatives, i.e. read them, examine and amend them. The House of Representatives has the last word and may adopt or reject the amendments made by the Senate. The evocation and examination by the Senate are subject to strict time limits. The parliamentary conciliation committee, consisting of deputies and senators with parity of representation, may extend or reduce the time limits in question⁽¹⁾.

Application of the optional bicameral procedure

The matters in which this procedure applies are explicitly listed in the Constitution. It concerns, insofar as the compulsory bicameral procedure⁽²⁾, meant by article 77 of the Constitution, is not applied:

- laws enacted pursuant to laws subject to a special majority
- the institutional legislation concerning the structure and the functioning of the State (art. 78, paragraph 1, 2° of the Constitution)
- laws adopted pursuant to article 169 of the Constitution in order to guarantee compliance with international or supranational obligations
- laws relating to the Council of State and the federal administrative jurisdictions.

The members of the House of Representatives (through Private Member's Bills), and the King i.e. the federal government (through Bills) may take a legislative initiative.

The Private Member's Bills from members of the House of Representatives are submitted to the House. The government Bills are always submitted to the House of Representatives.

House of Representatives: first examination

The Bill or Private Member's Bill is examined, perhaps amended and voted on within the competent committee and then in the plenary session.

The adopted Bill is sent to the Senate

The senators must decide within a period of 15 days of receipt of the bill, whether they wish to "evoke" it or not, i.e. examine it. Evocation is only possible at the request of the majority of the senators (= at least 31 senators), with at least one-third of the members of each linguistic group.

If the Bill is not evoked (on time) by the Senate, it is immediately submitted for Royal signature and promulgation by the King (step 8).

Examination by the Senate

The Senate has a period of 30 days to examine the evoked Bill. If the Senate does not amend the text or if it allows the examination period to lapse without making a decision, the Bill is immediately submitted for Royal signature by the House of Representatives (step 8).

Referral to the House of Representatives

If the Senate amends the Bill, it is referred back to the House.

House of Representatives: second (definitive) examination

The House has the last word. Whatever the decision of the House may be (agree with the amendments of the Senate, reject the amendments of the Senate, new amendments), it concerns a final decision: that means the end of the parliamentary procedure.

The House sends the text it adopted to the King for Royal signature and promulgation.
